

Women in crime

Over the last 50 years women have been increasing their participation in the labor market and in the crime market

Keywords: crime, women, gender gaps

ELEVATOR PITCH

In recent decades, women's participation in the labor market has increased considerably in most countries and is converging toward the participation rate of men. Though on a lesser scale, a similar movement toward gender convergence seems to be occurring in the criminal world, though many more men than women still engage in criminal activity. Technological progress and social norms have freed women from the home, increasing their participation in both the labor market and the crime market. With crime no longer just men's business, it is important to investigate female criminal behavior to determine whether the policy prescriptions to reduce crime should differ for women.

KEY FINDINGS

Pros

- + More women are committing crimes than in the past, but they have not yet caught up with men.
- + The gender gap in crime is partly explained by women's weaker criminal abilities and greater risk aversion.
- + Since having young children reduces a woman's propensity to commit crimes, subsidies for having children might reduce female criminality.
- + Married women are more likely to have children and to be able to insure against negative income shocks through their husbands' incomes, thus reducing their propensity to crime.
- + Reducing wage disparities across female skilled and unskilled workers might decrease the propensity of women to commit crimes.

Female prisoners make up less than 10% of the prison population in industrial countries

Source: International Centre for Prison Studies. Online at: <http://www.prisonstudies.org>

I Z A
World of Labor

Cons

- Traditional policies to fight crime have not distinguished between women and men, as not enough is known about what motivates female criminals.
- Technological progress and social norms have freed women from the home, increasing their participation in both the labor market and the crime market.
- A higher participation of women in the labor market might increase female participation in the crime market.
- Convergence in the social roles of women and men might increase crimes committed by women.
- The judicial system seems to be more lenient toward female offenders.

AUTHOR'S MAIN MESSAGE

There is still a gender gap in the crime market, but the number of women committing crimes is on the rise, partly because other socio-economic gender gaps have been shrinking. Women have more freedom than in the past, and with that come more opportunities for crime. Despite increasing social equality, police and judicial systems still tend to be more lenient with female than with male offenders. Policies to reduce wage disparities between skilled and unskilled female workers, such as incentivizing female education, might reduce crime among disadvantaged women. Family support policies, by encouraging marriage and having children, might also reduce crime among women.